In several non- or low-virulent bacteria, virulence genes have been lost through deletion or acquisition of mutations that either prevent the expression of a full-length protein or give rise to an inactive product (Denecker et al., 2002; Higashi et al., 2002; Roche et al., 2005).

Specifically, genome-wide expression profiling using microarrays demonstrated differential expression of key virulence and stress fitness genes between the two genotypes following growth in DMEM. The microarray data were confirmed by qRT-PCR, and variations in survival rates were examined in the model stomach system.

Differential Expression of Quorum-Sensing Genes in Pseudomonas Using Garlic Extract Andrew James Moss The virulence of invasive bacteria can be reduced without reducing population. Certain chemicals in Allium sativum (garlic) have shown promise as virulence reducing agents. I chose to use this plant to try to affect the expression of the Pseudomonas aeruginosa virulence factor of pyocyanin production.
