structure and function. The study explored whether the children's drawings accurately reflect their conceptual understanding about plants in a manner that can be interpreted by others. Drawing, survey, interview, and observational data were collected from 182 students in grades K and 1 in rural southeastern United States. Results demonstrated the children held a wide range of conceptions concerning plant structure and function.

can see how drawing might contribute to the formulation of thinking and meaning. The following diagram (Figure 2) builds on Vygotsky's theory and illustrates a connection between thought, drawing and the development of visual thought (Brooks, 2003). We can now see how drawing is an important mediation tool for thinking and for meaning making.
