declining and have become composed of smaller fish. The main signals from the environment were short-term effects, but the trends found were probably combined consequences of climate variability and fishing. I developed a multispecies size-spectrum model to explore the dynamics of the pelagic community.

Planktivorous pelagic fish species, i.e. mesopredators, play an important role in marine ecosystems as they may induce changes in ecosystem structure through bottom-up (affecting their predators) and top-down (affecting their prey) mechanisms ("wasp-waist" control, Cury et al., 2000; Fauchald et al., 2011) and even lock the ecosystem in an alternative state through foodweb interactions (Pace et al., 1999; Casini et al., 2008; Møllmann et al., 2008).

ment should also include a comprehensive understanding of fish behaviours that may influence vulnerability (Pitcher, 1995; Freon & Misund, 1999). The objective of the present study was to investigate the responses of the northern anchovy to the dynamics of the pelagic environment in the upwelling area of the west coast of Baja California, Mexico.

Understanding whether changes to prey availability may result in changes to the small pelagic fish community is a pressing need, as recent studies have already demonstrated the early signs of changing zooplankton communities in the Northwest Atlantic arising from changing hydrographic patterns of the region, particularly on the Newfoundland and Scotian Shelves and in the Gulf of Maine (Greene and Pershing, 2007, Beaugrand et al., 2010, Head and Pepin, 2010).
